Manager Commentary

November closed in positive territory for the S&P 500, rising 0.13% for the month and a robust 16.45% year-to-date. Although November was relatively weak compared with the past decade's seasonality, the shallow pullback may have set the stage for a liquidity-fuelled rally. U.S. equities were volatile but rebounded strongly late in the month. Early weakness from AI-related profit-taking and valuation concerns gave way to improved sentiment, driven by strong corporate earnings and the prospect of a December Federal Reserve rate cut. The S&P 500 finished marginally higher, supported by 83% of constituents beating earnings expectations.

The recent U.S. government shutdown, lasting 43 days — the longest on record — had a clear adverse impact on market liquidity. Liquidity remains critical for the stability of risk assets, and both the U.S. and China saw a loss of momentum through November. The end of Quantitative Tightening on 1 December, alongside Treasury General Account outflows and increased bill issuance, should improve liquidity, although the scale of monetary expansion may create an inflationary impulse.

UK equities faced a challenging November, with the FTSE 100 declining around 3.4% following October's record highs, driven by profit-taking and caution ahead of key data and Bank of England guidance. Despite this, the index remains up nearly 19% year-to-date, supported by commodities and globally derived earnings. Gilt yields were volatile around the Autumn Budget, with the 10-year ending the month near 4.44%. Fiscal pressures persist, with public debt approaching £3 trillion. European equities performed better, posting modest gains on easing inflation, resilient earnings and expectations of gradual policy adjustments. Seasonal strength in December may support both regions, subject to geopolitical risks.

Japanese equities delivered a mixed performance, with the Nikkei 225 ending near 48,800 after volatility linked to profit-taking in technology stocks and geopolitical tensions with China. The TOPIX held above 3,200, supported by optimism around Prime Minister Takaichi's pro-growth agenda and ongoing corporate reforms. Japanese Government Bond yields continued to rise to multi-decade highs, with the 10-year at 1.79%, reflecting fiscal stimulus and sustainability concerns.

Chinese equities weakened, with the Shanghai Composite down 3.2% and the CSI 300 declining 4.7%, as early-month optimism faded amid renewed U.S.–China tensions and persistent property-sector fragility. Chinese bond yields also edged higher on expectations of further fiscal support.

The health sector performed strongly, and our Global Health holdings delivered solid returns. Technology posted negative performance over the month, while commodities — particularly precious metals — generated moderate gains.

Alpha Beta Portfolios have delivered strong performance this year, with risk thresholds consistently maintained and no breaches across any mandate. We made a measured increase in risk-asset exposure over the past month, positioning portfolios to benefit from an anticipated U.S. rate cut and the potential for a year-end rally.
